THE FUTURE OF CHRISTIANITY

The dust of twenty centuries has settled on a human life and a human death - a man born into obscurity, who lived a hidden life for thirty years or so, taught for a time, and was executed for treason and heresy. That might have been the end of it, except for what happened next - what is perhaps best described as a radical event. Whatever we believe about that event, its central figure remains the most influential in human history.

In one sense, we might feel removed from the life of Jesus, from the time he walked the earth two millennia past. We might feel distant from the early community that, having been scattered at his death, nonetheless gathered in his name, on fire with his message of love and ready to give their lives for their beliefs.

But in another sense, we are poised today to look upon Jesus with new eyes, to see and envision him as never before. Two thousand years have given us a kaleidoscope of perspectives on him, the insights of modern science, postmodern philosophy, and integral thought and contact with all the world's great religious traditions. We can see the paths that humanity has walked - their peaks and their pitfalls - with new clarity. And we can see the path that lies ahead, and perhaps begin to walk it in a new way.

*Come,
Spirit of Wisdom*

From this place, we can see that the ultimate goal of Christianity is that of metanoia or transformation — transformation into Christ - to experience Ultimate Reality or Spirit as Jesus did, as Abba, "Daddy."
